— Aṣṭāvakragītā, Prakaraṇa 12 (Chapter 12), Verses 6-7

GURU'S INTERPRETATION

The path to liberation, these verses tell us, unfolds in two apparent ways that ultimately converge. Just as ignorance leads you to compulsive action, so too does a cessation of action arise from that same ignorance. The key is understanding, a true knowing of the Self. Once you grasp the reality of your being, you realize that you are already established in that truth. This is the state that Aṣṭāvakra speaks of: "I am thus." He isn't striving, he isn't doing; he simply is in the fullness of awakened awareness.

Verse seven delves deeper into the nature of thought. Trying to grasp the ungraspable – the infinite, the absolute – by thinking about it only confines it within the limitations of thought itself. The mind, in its attempt to define the indefinable, merely creates another mental construct, another concept. This is the trap of intellectualization, where you become lost in theories and philosophies, mistaking them for the actual experience of truth. Aṣṭāvakra encourages you to abandon this futile exercise. By letting go of the need to conceptualize the unconceptualizable, you can rest in the natural state of being. Again, "I am thus," is the unwavering declaration of one who has seen through the illusion.

How does this apply to your modern life? You are constantly bombarded with information, demands, and expectations. The pressure to "do" and "achieve" can be overwhelming, leading to stress and anxiety. These verses remind you that true peace isn't found in endless striving, nor in escaping into inaction, but in recognizing the inherent stillness within. By understanding that your true nature is beyond the reach of thought, you can begin to release the grip of mental chatter and rest in the present moment. It's about recognizing that you are already whole, already complete, and already free. The challenge is to live from that place of knowing, to respond to life from a space of inner peace, rather than reacting from a place of fear or attachment.

REFLECTION FOR TODAY

Can you identify an area in your life where you are overthinking or trying to control an outcome, and how might you apply the wisdom of "I am thus" to release that mental grip?
