— Aṣṭāvakraḡītā, Prakaraṇa 15 (Chapter 15), Verses 19-20

GURU'S INTERPRETATION

Cease agitating your mind, O you who are pure consciousness, with the waves of saṁkalpa (intention) and vikalpa (doubt). Find peace and rest in your own Self, the embodiment of bliss. These verses call you to transcend the mental chatter that keeps you bound to suffering. Saṁkalpa and vikalpa represent the constant stream of desires, plans, and anxieties that occupy your awareness. They are the mental constructs that create a sense of lack and drive you to seek fulfillment outside yourself. By ceasing to identify with these fleeting thoughts, you can discover the inherent peace and joy that resides within.

The text urges you to abandon even the act of meditation itself and to hold nothing in your heart. This may seem paradoxical, but the intention is to go beyond all techniques and mental exercises to realize the truth of your being. You are already free, already complete. Why then, would you deliberate about what to do? The path to liberation is not about acquiring something new, but about recognizing what is already present: your true Self, which is unbounded and eternal. This freedom is not something to be attained through effort; it is your natural state.

In modern life, this wisdom encourages you to step back from the relentless pursuit of external validation and achievement. You are bombarded with messages telling you what you need to be happy – a better job, a nicer car, a more fulfilling relationship. But these are all forms of saṁkalpa and vikalpa, keeping you trapped in a cycle of wanting. By letting go of these desires and anxieties, you can find contentment in the present moment, just as you are. Instead of constantly striving for something more, cultivate an awareness of the inherent goodness within yourself. You are already whole. You are already free.

REFLECTION FOR TODAY

What limiting belief about yourself can you gently release today, trusting that you are already enough?
