— Aṣṭāvakra-gītā, Prakaraṇa 2 (Chapter 2), Verses 24-25

GURU'S INTERPRETATION

Imagine the vast ocean of your own being, limitless and profound. This is the "me," the infinite consciousness that Ashtavakra speaks of. When the winds of the mind, the "citta vata," subside and grow still within you, the unfortunate merchant of the ego, the "jīva vaṇijo," clings desperately to the perishable ship of the world, "jagat poto vinaśvaraḥ." This ship, representing your limited identity and attachments, is destined to eventually break apart. This verse paints a picture of suffering arising from clinging to transient things. You are meant to recognize the futility of identifying with the ever-changing world and instead find solace in the unchanging ocean of your true self.

The second verse continues this oceanic metaphor, describing the wonder of individual lives, the "jīva vīcayaḥ," as mere waves arising, crashing, playing, and dissolving naturally within the infinite ocean of consciousness. These waves are born, they live out their fleeting existence, and then they merge back into the ocean from which they came. There is no need to fear or resist this natural process. Your individual life, with all its joys and sorrows, is simply a wave in this vast ocean. The beauty lies in understanding that you are not just the wave, but also the ocean itself.

In modern life, we are constantly bombarded with messages that encourage us to identify with our roles, possessions, and achievements. We build our identities on shifting sands, forgetting the solid ground of our true nature. Ashtavakra's teachings offer a powerful antidote. By recognizing the impermanence of all things and turning inward to discover the boundless ocean of consciousness within, you can find lasting peace and freedom from suffering. Let go of your clinging to the ship and embrace the vastness of the sea. Understand your anxieties, fears, and attachments are simply waves arising and passing in the ocean of your being.

REFLECTION FOR TODAY

If your life is but a wave in the ocean of consciousness, what would it feel like to truly embrace the vastness and serenity of the ocean itself?
