— Brahmapurāṇa, Chapter 180: Manifestations and incarnations of Viṣṇu (Chapter 180), Verse 1

GURU'S INTERPRETATION

The Brahmapurāṇa opens a window into the divine dance of creation and dissolution, acknowledging that what is created is also ultimately withdrawn. This verse pays homage to Brahma, the first god, the originator, recognizing the cyclical nature of existence. It is a profound bow to the very source of manifestation, understood through deep meditative focus.

The subsequent lines offer a powerful salutation to Viṣṇu, the unchanging, the pure, the eternal Paramātmā – the Supreme Soul. Viṣṇu is described as being of a constant, singular form, the ever-victorious. This speaks to the underlying, unwavering reality that persists beyond the fluctuating appearances of the world. He is the embodiment of truth, untouched by the changes and imperfections that characterize the manifested universe.

In your own life, this verse encourages you to seek the unchangeable within yourself, that pure essence unaffected by the daily dramas and challenges. Just as Viṣṇu remains constant amidst the cosmic play, you too possess an inner stillness that can be accessed through meditation and self-reflection. When facing difficulties, remember the "avikārāya śuddhāya nityāya," the unchanging, pure, and eternal aspect within. This remembrance provides strength and perspective. The world around you might be in constant flux, but your inner self, your connection to the Paramātmā, remains a source of unwavering peace and resilience. Embracing this understanding allows you to navigate life's uncertainties with greater equanimity and faith. The acknowledgement of both Brahma and Viṣṇu is a reminder that creation and preservation, change and constancy, are intertwined aspects of the divine. By honoring both, you can find balance in your own life, accepting the flow of change while anchoring yourself in the eternal.

REFLECTION FOR TODAY

In what areas of your life can you cultivate a deeper connection to your unchanging inner self, and how might this inner connection help you navigate life's challenges with more grace and peace?
