GURU'S INTERPRETATION

It begins by asserting that these roles are defined and understood through specific attributes and their relationships. Something unmentioned, without explicit qualities, cannot be related or understood through its own inherent characteristics. Think of it like this: a seed holds potential, but without the context of soil, water, and sunlight, its potential remains dormant and undefined.

The text then draws a parallel with everyday experience. The world doesn't concern itself with explicitly naming what is already self-evident. Just as our ears perceive sound without needing a separate declaration of the ear's function, some realities are grasped directly, without the need for verbal designation. This speaks to the innate wisdom residing within each of you, a direct knowing that bypasses intellectual constructs.

Furthermore, the Tantravārttika considers the implications if all words (specifically those ending in 'sup' and 'tin', denoting case endings and verb conjugations respectively) were inherently substance-denoting. If that were the case, then grammatical attributes like gender and number would automatically apply, similar to how they apply to words formed with 'kr̥t' suffixes. This highlights the importance of understanding the nuances of language to avoid misinterpreting the underlying reality. It encourages you to look beyond the surface level of words and discern the deeper meaning they convey.

In modern life, this wisdom translates to mindful communication and discerning perception. You are urged to be conscious of the attributes and relationships you assign to people and situations, understanding that these shape your experience. Avoid labeling others or yourself based on superficial observations. Instead, cultivate the ability to perceive the inherent potential and unmanifested possibilities that lie beneath the surface. Just as the ear simply hears, train yourself to directly perceive the truth of each moment, free from the filters of preconceived notions.

REFLECTION FOR TODAY

Are you allowing preconceived notions to define your reality, or are you cultivating the capacity to perceive the inherent truth of each moment?
