— Tantravārttika, (Chapter 7, Verse 90B) #M

GURU'S INTERPRETATION

The verses from the Tantravārttika offer a profound insight into the nature of truth and the role of inner conviction in spiritual life. It begins with powerful analogies: just as anything born in a salt mine is inherently salty, or anything emerging from the resplendent, golden earth of Mount Meru is golden, so too does true knowledge, born from the enlightened, reflect that enlightenment. This speaks to the fundamental unity of source and manifestation. It suggests that when wisdom arises from a truly realized being, its essence is inseparable from the source of that wisdom.

The text then emphasizes the importance of the inner voice, particularly for those seeking deeper understanding. It tells us that in situations where doubt clouds clarity, the inclinations of the heart – the “antaḥkaraṇa pravṛttayaḥ” – become a valid form of śrotra, for the virtuous. This isn't a call to reckless abandon, but rather a recognition that the refined intuition of those dedicated to truth carries weight. The verse goes on to say that the words born from the satisfaction of an enlightened being are inherently dharmic. This underscores that the actions and words of those dedicated to righteous conduct, stemming from their inner joy and contentment, are themselves a form of dharma. Because those who act piously and with awareness will also be considered authoritative for how we conduct ourselves, or achara.

How can you apply this wisdom today? It invites you to cultivate inner discernment. Not every external authority holds truth, and sometimes the deepest answers lie within your own heart, particularly after dedicated introspection and practice. Develop your intuition, listen to your conscience, and trust the wisdom that arises from a place of inner peace and alignment with dharma. This doesn't negate the need for study and guidance, but emphasizes the importance of integrating external knowledge with your own inner knowing.

REFLECTION FOR TODAY

Are you actively cultivating the inner stillness necessary to hear and trust the wisdom arising from your own heart, and how might you create more space for that in your daily life?
