

MyGurukul

SACRED WISDOM — SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 14, 2026

SACRED TEXT

tulayitvā naraṃ pūrvaṃ cihnaṃ kuryād dhaṭasya tu | 20.010a
kakṣāsthānena taṃ tulyam avatārya tato dhaṭāt || 10 || 20.010c
samayaiḥ parigrhyainaṃ punar āropayen naraḥ | 20.011a
tasminn evaṃ kṛte sā cet kakṣe sthāpya suniścalā || 11 || 20.011c

— Nāradaśmr̥ti, Chapter 1, Verse 1

GURU'S INTERPRETATION

Imagine you are a goldsmith meticulously weighing a precious metal. This passage from the Nāradaśmr̥ti, though seemingly about legal procedures, offers a profound spiritual metaphor about self-assessment and growth. It speaks of "weighing" a person, marking them like a pot, and then carefully lifting and placing them down, referencing the "kaksha," perhaps the armpit, as a point of reference. The idea is to measure the person against a standard, remove them, and then, according to agreements, place them back, ensuring they remain stable in that position.

Spiritually, this resonates with the process of self-reflection. We must first honestly assess our current state, our strengths and weaknesses, marking them like a pot with identifying symbols. The "kaksha," a hidden, intimate part of the body, suggests looking at our hidden flaws and vulnerabilities, not just our outward appearance. This initial assessment is crucial.

Then, we "lift" ourselves from that state, separating from our old habits and patterns, to gain perspective. The act of "placing back" signifies reintegrating into life, but with a newfound stability. This isn't about staying the same; it's about solidifying the positive changes we've made. The agreements mentioned likely refer to vows or commitments made to oneself or a higher power, guiding our actions after the self-evaluation.

In modern life, this applies beautifully. We constantly face pressures and temptations. Taking time for self-reflection, perhaps through meditation or journaling, allows us to weigh our choices against our values. We identify where we fall short, lift ourselves from those negative patterns, and consciously choose to realign with our higher selves. The "stability" gained is the inner peace that comes from living in alignment with our truth. The process is ongoing, a continuous cycle of self-assessment, growth, and reintegration.

REFLECTION FOR TODAY

Are you willing to look honestly at your "kaksha," your hidden vulnerabilities, to begin the process of true self-weighing and spiritual growth today?