SACRED TEXT

*nādhmātaḥ kṣudhitaḥ śrānto na ca vyākula-cetanaḥ |

— Bhagavadgītā-4comm with the commentaries of Śrīdhara, Madhusūdana, Viśvanātha and Baladeva, Chapter 1, Verse

1

GURU'S INTERPRETATION

The verse speaks to the necessity of preparing your inner landscape before engaging in the transformative process of yoga, so that the practice itself may be effective. It emphasizes that a yogi, striving for self-perfection, should not practice when overly full, hungry, tired, or mentally agitated. Each condition represents a distraction, a hindrance to the focus and clarity required for connecting with your true Self.

Think of it like planting a seed. You wouldn't sow it in rocky, barren ground, would you? Similarly, approaching yoga with a restless mind or a body screaming with unmet needs creates an internal environment unsuitable for spiritual growth. When you are hungry or overfull, your energy is consumed by digestion. When exhausted, your mind is clouded, unable to focus. And when agitated, your emotions become a tempest, obscuring the still, small voice within.

In modern life, this wisdom translates directly to how you approach any endeavor, spiritual or otherwise. Are you trying to meditate after a stressful day without first taking time to unwind? Are you attempting to learn a new skill when you are already mentally drained? Krishna's teaching here encourages you to assess your internal state before embarking on any practice aimed at self-improvement. Create the right conditions for success by tending to your basic needs – physical and mental – so that you can bring your full presence and attention to the task at hand. It's about cultivating self-awareness and recognizing when you are truly ready to engage in meaningful practice, whatever form that may take. It's about acknowledging that true progress arises from a place of inner stillness and balance.

REFLECTION FOR TODAY

Are you truly present and prepared when you engage in your daily practices, or are you pushing through while your mind and body are elsewhere?
