SACRED TEXT

*vistareṇātmano yogaṃ vibhūtiṃ ca janārdana |
bhūyaḥ kathaya trptir hi śṛṇvato nāsti me 'mṛtam || 18 ||*

— Bhagavadgītā-4comm with the commentaries of Śrīdhara, Madhusūdana, Viśvanātha and Baladeva, Chapter 1, Verse 18

GURU'S INTERPRETATION

Arjuna's plea in this verse resonates deeply within the human spirit, a yearning for deeper understanding of the divine. He implores Krishna, referred to here as Janardana (one who is worshiped by all), to further expound on His divine yoga and manifestations, His vibhuti. Arjuna confesses that he finds no satiety in listening to this nectar of wisdom, implying that the more he hears, the more he desires to know. This isn't mere curiosity; it's a spiritual hunger, a thirst for the infinite that resides within each of us.

The context is crucial. Arjuna stands on the precipice of battle, facing moral and existential turmoil. Krishna's teachings are not simply philosophical musings but a lifeline, a way to navigate the complexities of duty and dharma. Arjuna's repeated request highlights the transformative power of divine knowledge. It's not enough to hear it once; it requires continual contemplation and absorption. The nectar of immortality, amritam, is not a literal elixir but the realization of one's true nature, which transcends the limitations of the ego and the fear of death.

In modern life, we often find ourselves overwhelmed by information, yet starved for meaning. We are bombarded with distractions that pull us away from our inner selves. Arjuna's desire for deeper understanding serves as a powerful reminder to seek out sources of wisdom that nourish our souls. This could involve studying sacred texts, engaging in meditation, or spending time in nature. The key is to cultivate a receptive mind, a willingness to learn and grow, and to recognize that true fulfillment comes not from external achievements but from inner realization. Just as Arjuna sought to understand Krishna's divine manifestations, we can strive to recognize the divine spark within ourselves and in the world around us. Your journey of self-discovery is ongoing. Embrace it with the same fervor as Arjuna.
