— Skandapurāṇa, Chapter 29, Verses 108-110

GURU'S INTERPRETATION

This sacred hymn from the Skandapurāṇa offers profound insights into the nature of the Divine, and how you can recognize the Divine within yourself and the world around you. It begins by bowing to the one who knows the intricacies of time (kālakalājñāya), encompassing both the whole (sakalāyā) and the partless (akalāya). This speaks to the Divine's mastery over creation and its ability to exist both within and beyond the limitations of our understanding. It acknowledges the Divine's presence in the very essence of reality (tattvādhivāsāya) and even as the lord of departed spirits (pretādhipataye), reminding you that even in death and perceived darkness, the Divine presence remains.

The verses then honor the Divine as being without anger (krodhavihīnāya) yet also as the master of anger (krodhādhipataye). This points to the controlled and purposeful use of energy, differentiating it from uncontrolled rage. It encourages you to cultivate equanimity, transforming destructive emotions into constructive forces. Salutations are offered to the one who embodies effort (śramāyāśramiṇe) and removes weariness (śramāpanayanāya), signifying that the Divine supports your endeavors and provides solace in times of exhaustion. This highlights the importance of both action and rest, reminding you to find balance in your life.

The passage continues by praising the one who knows the taste of the nectar of knowledge (jñānarasajñāya), is knowledgeable (jñānine), and dispels ignorance (ajñānahāriṇe). This emphasizes the pursuit of wisdom as a path to liberation. It recognizes the Divine as being both engaged in austerity (saktāya tapasi) and devoted to prosperity (aiśvaryaniratāya), illustrating that spirituality and worldly success are not mutually exclusive. You can strive for material well-being while remaining grounded in spiritual principles. This passage calls you to recognize the Divine in every aspect of existence, from the grandest cosmic events to the smallest, most personal experiences. It urges you to cultivate wisdom, balance your emotions, and strive for both inner peace and outer success, remembering that the Divine supports you every step of the way.
