

MyGurukul

SACRED WISDOM — SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 14, 2026

SACRED TEXT

tasyaiva ca prasādena nāsau gamyaḥ śiloccayaḥ |
sarvadevanikāyānāṃ bhūtānāṃ caiva sarvaśaḥ || 39 ||
tasmingirivare devī tapastepe suduścaram |
vārṅkṣe dadhānā rucire vāsasī dharmasādhane || 40 ||

— Skandapurāṇa, Chapter 34, Verses 39-40

GURU'S INTERPRETATION

These verses from the Skandapurāṇa speak of divine grace and dedicated spiritual practice, offering timeless insights for your own journey. The first verse tells us that a certain mountain peak (śiloccayaḥ) remains inaccessible to all beings, including the gods themselves, save through the grace (prasādena) of the divine being associated with it. This highlights a fundamental principle: spiritual attainment is not solely dependent on effort or position, but ultimately relies on divine favor. We often strive, push, and strategize, forgetting that true progress comes when we surrender to a higher power and invite grace into our lives. This grace isn't arbitrary; it's earned through devotion and alignment with dharma.

The second verse then describes the Goddess (devī) engaging in intense austerities (tapastepe suduścaram) on that very mountain. She wears beautiful and auspicious garments (rucire vāsasī dharmasādhane) made of bark (vārṅkṣe), signifying simplicity and dedication to her spiritual purpose. This image is powerful: the divine feminine, the source of all creation, subjecting herself to rigorous discipline. It's a reminder that even the most powerful beings embrace self-discipline and unwavering commitment to their goals. Her tapas, her fiery spiritual practice, becomes the catalyst for her own empowerment and ultimately, for the benefit of the entire cosmos.

How does this translate to your life? The inaccessible mountain can be seen as your highest potential, the realization of your deepest self. It might seem impossible to reach, shrouded in doubt and fear. But the verses remind you that with devotion and sincere effort, divine grace can open the path. Emulate the Goddess's example by cultivating inner discipline, simplifying your life, and dedicating yourself to practices that align you with your dharma, your true purpose. Just as she adorned herself in simple bark garments, shed the unnecessary burdens of materialism and ego. Through consistent effort and humble surrender, you too can access the divine grace that unlocks your potential.

REFLECTION FOR TODAY

What "mountain" in your life feels inaccessible right now, and what small act of devotion or discipline can you undertake today to invite grace into the situation?