SACRED TEXT

*evamuktaḥ sa bhagavānbrahmaṇā devasattamaḥ |
svakam tejo mahaddivyaṁ vyasrjatsarvayogavit || 17 ||*

— Skandapurāṇa, Chapter 9, Verse 17

GURU'S INTERPRETATION

Having been spoken to thus by Brahma, that best of gods, the all-knowing one, then released his own great and divine energy. This verse from the Skandapurāṇa, though seemingly simple, holds profound spiritual significance. Imagine the scene: Brahma, the creator, addresses the divine being, prompting a response not of words, but of pure, unadulterated energy. This energy isn't just any energy; it's described as "svakam tejo mahaddivyaṁ," his own great and divine energy. This highlights the personal and intrinsic nature of the power being unleashed. It is not borrowed or externally sourced, but emanates directly from the source itself. The phrase "sarvayogavit," meaning "all-knowing," further emphasizes the competence and control with which this energy is deployed.

In our modern lives, we often feel depleted, scattered, and disconnected from our own inner power. We seek external validation and energy sources, forgetting that within each of us lies a reservoir of "svakam tejo mahaddivyaṁ," our own great and divine energy. Just as the divine being in the verse responds to Brahma's prompting by releasing his inherent energy, we too can learn to access and cultivate our own inner power. This requires introspection, self-awareness, and a willingness to tap into the source within.

The verse serves as a reminder that we are not merely passive recipients of the world's energy, but active participants in its creation and flow. By connecting with our inner selves, through practices like meditation, mindfulness, or simply spending time in nature, we can begin to access and unleash our own divine energy. This energy can then be channeled towards our goals, our relationships, and our overall well-being, transforming us from feeling powerless to feeling empowered and connected to the divine. The "all-knowing" aspect reminds us that we possess an innate wisdom that guides us when we connect to this inner source. Cultivating this connection is a lifelong journey, but this verse offers a potent starting point.

REFLECTION FOR TODAY

What small step can you take today to connect with your own "svakam tejo mahaddivyaṁ," your own great and divine energy, and allow it to illuminate your path?
