

MyGurukul

SACRED WISDOM — SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 14, 2026

SACRED TEXT

*dhyānaṃ kalpatarur loke jñānapuṣpaiḥ sapuṣpito | [supuṣpito ?]
mokṣāmṛtaphalair nityaṃ phalitoyaṃ sukhapradaiḥ || 108 ||
tathā kuru yathā śukladhyānavṛkṣasamāśritaḥ |
cinvāno jñānapuṣpāṇi labhen mokṣaphalaṃ budhaḥ || 109 ||
asminn eva bhava saumya vyomarūpaḥ sanātanaḥ |
śukladhyānāt sadānando yogī muktipadaṃ vrajet || 110 ||*

— Yogapradīpa, Chapter 1, Verses 108-110

GURU'S INTERPRETATION

Imagine meditation as a wish-fulfilling tree, a kalpataru, blossoming with the flowers of knowledge. This is the essence of the Yogapradīpa's beautiful metaphor. This tree constantly bears the fruits of liberation, moksha, promising unending joy. It's a powerful image, isn't it? It suggests that meditation isn't just a practice; it's a source of profound fulfillment and lasting happiness.

The scripture urges you to cultivate this "white" or pure meditation, śukladhyāna, like embracing a tree. By carefully gathering the flowers of wisdom—the insights and understandings that arise during your practice—you, the wise one, can attain the fruit of liberation. This isn't a passive process. It requires active engagement, a conscious effort to nurture your inner garden and harvest the rewards.

The passage continues, encouraging you to realize your eternal, sky-like nature (vyomarūpaḥ sanātanaḥ) even within this very life. Through consistent and dedicated śukladhyāna, the yogi, filled with perpetual bliss, reaches the state of liberation. It suggests that liberation isn't some distant goal but a potentiality that resides within you, waiting to be awakened through diligent practice.

In our modern world, this ancient wisdom offers a beacon of hope. Amidst the chaos and distractions, the kalpataru of meditation provides a sanctuary. By dedicating even a few moments each day to stilling the mind and turning inward, you can begin to cultivate this inner garden. The flowers of knowledge may appear as flashes of insight during your meditation, or as a deeper understanding of yourself and the world around you. Each moment of peace, each glimmer of understanding, is a step closer to the ultimate fruit of liberation. The promise is clear: consistent practice leads to lasting joy and freedom.

REFLECTION FOR TODAY

What small, mindful action can you take today to nurture the wish-fulfilling tree of meditation within you?