— Yogapradīpa, Chapter 1, Verses 37-39

GURU'S INTERPRETATION

The Yogapradīpa here guides you to understand the nature of the Divine, the ultimate reality that resides within and beyond all things. It speaks of a being that is whole, without parts (niṣakalo), free from ego and possessiveness (nirmamaḥ), and filled with an unshakeable peace (śāntaḥ). This being is all-knowing (sarvajñaḥ), the source of all happiness (sukhadaḥ), and the ultimate master (prabhuḥ). This, the scripture declares, is the one and only God (bhagavān eko devaḥ), pure and untainted (nirañjanaḥ), the one you should strive to know.

Think of this Divine being as the very essence of space (vyomarūpo), the lord of the universe (jagannāthaḥ), beyond action, time, and qualities (kriyākālaguṇottaraḥ). This being is untouched by the cycle of creation and destruction (saṁsārasṛṣṭibhir muktaḥ), radiating a light unlike any other (sarvatejo vilakṣaṇaḥ). It is filled with pure knowledge (kevalajñānasampūrṇaḥ), resting in pure bliss (kevalānandasamśritaḥ), and can only be reached through unwavering devotion and meditation (kevaladhyānagamyas ca). This, the scripture emphasizes, is the Lord of all beings, present right here, right now (deveśoyam ihocyate).

In modern life, where distractions are constant and the ego often dictates our actions, these verses offer a profound anchor. They remind you to seek the stillness within, to cultivate detachment from your possessions and desires, and to strive for a state of equanimity amidst the chaos. By recognizing the Divine within yourself and in all beings, you can break free from the cycle of suffering and find true joy. The path to this realization lies in consistent practice, in turning your attention inward, and in cultivating a deep and unwavering connection with the source of all creation. By embracing the qualities of the Divine—peace, knowledge, and bliss—you can transform your life and contribute to a more harmonious world.

REFLECTION FOR TODAY

In what ways can you consciously embody the qualities of peace, detachment, and pure knowledge in your daily interactions and decisions today?
